

Hannes Hagspeil prepares K-7 sailplane for flight. The engineless craft uses air currents for flight, once it is in the wild blue yonder of Heber Valley.

hawk for company, and once in awhile another sailplane will come over to investigate your thermal, only to find that the one he left is better.

Sailplanes are among the strongest aircraft built. They are capable of doing most anything in the air, including loops. They can stay airborne as long as the skill and endurance of the pilot will permit, which often runs into hours. The trick is to find the thermals, ride up on them, and fly. Finding these rising columns of air is tricky at times.

The soaring school in Heber City is the 10th such school in the United States, and will operate seven days a week during the summer. If the interest is great enough, and if Saturday is any indication, the school will operate year-round, says Frank, Kelsey president of the Utah Soaring Association. The elements in Heber Valley are fantastic for soaring—as good as can be found anywhere.
